

SUTTON HOO HELMET AND SHIP SCULPTURE

BOOGIE WALL

Hoo helmet that have helped shape our understanding of the origins of English history. This awe-inspiring Anglo-Saxon royal burial site has been through an incredible transformation, thanks to a £4 million investment – the biggest investment the National Trust has ever made! The experience for visitors to the site is to bring the story of a spectacular King's ship burial and his treasures to life. Visitors are greeted in the Courtyard with a full-size, 27-metre long sculpture representing the Anglo-Saxon ship buried there, whilst the Exhibition Hall and Tranmer House, the former home of Edith Pretty, offer dramatic new displays, installations and immersive experiences. There's also River View walking trail, a new-look King's River Café and the brand new Keepers' Café. Later this autumn, the final part of the project will include a 17-metre high observation tower, offering birds-eye views across the Royal Burial Ground to the wider landscape.

Tintagel Bridge

BRIDGING THE GAP!

As featured in our Travel News, p10, Tintagel Castle, North Cornwall, is one of the most spectacular historic sites in Britain. But the path to the castle has long been challenging, with over a hundred steps winding towards to the cliff-top ruins. So they've built a new footbridge, recreating the historic crossing from the mainland, over the 190-metre drop between the two cliffs.

WHAT WE'RE READING

English Gardens

01 OCTOBER 2019

Leaving through Rizzoli's new book on English Gardens by Kathryn Bradley-Hole is a colourful way to find an alternative Britain. Head to Salisbury for Heale House's Japanese garden, say, or the Isles of Scilly for Tresco Abbey's subtropical setting. The useful visitor's information and map explains where to go when as some of these exotic gardens open on certain days, by appointment or even for B&B.
